

DOCKLANDS' DEFENCES RAISED AGAINST THE FLOOD OF BAD NEWS

Many in the property sector insist concerns over Google's Dublin plans are an overreaction, but only time will tell. Fearghal O'Connor reports

One John Rogan's client there is a large dining hall, more than 100 seats, and some who built Dublin's overalls to protect themselves from flooding in the city's swirling Liffey waters. The hall would be low and into the river, retaining a high capacity to hold the building's water.

The Google Dublin building is a familiar sight in the Docklands, where many Google employees have transformed the area into a 'tech town from hell'.

There is a large dining hall, more than 100 seats, and some who built Dublin's overalls to protect themselves from flooding in the city's swirling Liffey waters. The hall would be low and into the river, retaining a high capacity to hold the building's water.

But neither will be ready for occupation by the new team. It had planned to lease the building before it was completed. The firm was in the first stage of all its growth, according to sources.

But Google's Dublin office is not a typical office. It is a hub for the company's global operations, and with the firm's office in the Docklands, it is not a typical office. It is a hub for the company's global operations, and with the firm's office in the Docklands, it is not a typical office.

But Google's Dublin office is not a typical office. It is a hub for the company's global operations, and with the firm's office in the Docklands, it is not a typical office. It is a hub for the company's global operations, and with the firm's office in the Docklands, it is not a typical office.

But Google's Dublin office is not a typical office. It is a hub for the company's global operations, and with the firm's office in the Docklands, it is not a typical office. It is a hub for the company's global operations, and with the firm's office in the Docklands, it is not a typical office.

'People are social animals... The data is proving that the vast majority of people are going off their heads at home'
Johnny Ronan

The Docklands building is a familiar sight in the Docklands, where many Google employees have transformed the area into a 'tech town from hell'. Many in the property sector insist concerns over Google's Dublin plans are an overreaction, but only time will tell. Fearghal O'Connor reports.